An inclusive cocktail to-go program needed to happen a month ago, but the next best time to start something is now. It was one of her closest friends, sobbing uncontrollably. The more I saw that, the more I thought about my hometown and the things that are a part of Philly culture—water ice being one of those things. So she raised $800 to feed us back-of-house workers, in the kitchen and the environmental service team that cleans the rooms. We are limited because we have to keep tables six feet apart, so it's not going to change too much. Instead of, "How many people should we expect at our grand opening?" we asked ourselves, "How will we ensure social distancing?" Instead of, "Will people like our food?" it became, "Will people feel safe going out to eat?" But even if customers don't come, the bills do. But every time we start driving to the store each morning, we feel an odd sense of normalcy. Tables will have, at most, four people. We had to drive two hours away to Albuquerque or four and a half hours to Phoenix just to get falafel and hummus. No one could focus on anything else. February was the biggest month we've ever had, and we thought we were going into a killer season. But Cane is a really important restaurant to our community. There's an uptick in to-go orders. That's not true for a lot of other places. I say that knowing we're not going to reopen anytime soon. I've told people, "We're going to open in the fall! We're going to open in the winter!" This spring we were going to open for real. If we can use our spices to give light to this issue, that is how we can be of service." Sana Javeri Kadri, Diaspora Co., Oakland, CA: I made the decision to come back to the U.S. two weeks ago. Figuring out a solution where there doesn't seem to be one. We have added more regions to our Costco network faster than we expected. We're taking the protocols very seriously, but it is like every day you have to watch the news because the rules are constantly changing. The parks, a lot of them were immediately bumper-to-bumper full. I'm used to working on our leadership development program, where we pair five women early in their cooking careers with five established women running their own restaurants. We are working with all kinds of people to help us continue this momentum into the future. Our employees are exhausted, too. No strings, no questions, no substitutions. There is always a line waiting for us to bring the food out. Just over these two weeks, we're at 1.3 million products from 240 brands donated to 28 hospitals. It was a $10 million investment. It seemed like nobody gave a fuck about them. The reality is that 75 to 95 percent of kitchen staff in L.A. is undocumented. But we think this new interest might also be because people have the time and flexibility to try a new kind of diet in quarantine. There's this old couple that was here almost every Sunday—I miss seeing them. There used to be a lot of restaurants on this street, but I heard many closed down because most people are just eating at home. We just launched Quarantine Flowers with our flower farmer Gina Strathman. We already had an app for doctors and nurses who are too busy to get lunch; they just pay for it on the app and pick it up at the cafeteria when it's ready. Their voices need to be elevated and heard. How on earth can I ask my restaurant clients to pay me a nickel when they are laying off their entire team and have no idea if they will survive this? Becca Parrish, Becca PR, New York City: Seventy-five percent of my clients are restaurants, and with hotels, it's probably 80 percent. I had to take out a loan this morning; restaurants just don't have reserves to live off of. We gave out all our perishables and groceries to employees, anything they could stock up on. It's really interesting to see a new wave of pop-ups that have come out of this economic downturn. At L'Amant Secret, the fine-dining restaurant at L'Escape, we had planned a collaborative dinner series with our chef Jongwon Son and aspiring young chefs in Korea. The app's live [shopping] basket was built to accommodate how chefs order throughout the day, so you don't click a button to check out or place the order. I've known the owner since I was a kid. In the beginning much of my Mama Dût business came from hair clients and followers on my hairstyling IG page. We did not expect to have to do this again, but here we are. We went from having 145 people come in for the earlier cabaret shows, followed by 300-plus people for the later night club events, to nothing. We had to close completely; drag performers were furloughed and staff had to go on unemployment. One of our friends, who works at Café Birdie in Los Angeles, is a resident of our apartment building—she cooks us Filipino food Monday through Friday so we don't have to leave our sewing machines and can keep working around the clock. We decided to donate a dollar from each mask to the Filipino Workers Center in downtown—that community is literally in our backyard, and there are so many people in it who have lost their jobs, contracted the virus, and have to sleep in their cars. So we're still going to open Talat Market in April, as long as the government will let us. Anna Lee, my wife, has gone back to school for interior design. Jackson-Beckham and Garrett Oliver, and learn about opportunities within the beer industry, and taste all these beer collaborations without having to fly all the way into Pittsburgh. Moving forward the digital aspect isn't going anywhere. A lot of people DM'd me, friends of mine
